Paul Flora worked for many years as a political cartoonist for international newspapers, including the renowned Die Zeit weekly. Throughout his long career, he became widely known for his sharp humor, distinctive line work, and ability to depict political and social themes in a humorous yet insightful manner

In the cartoon The Lovers II, a whole series of lovers is hidden beneath a wide, flowing hoop skirt. The lady in the image shamelessly maintains the facade of an outwardly proper appearance. The composition is symmetrical and simple, enhancing the humorous effect of the image and making the punchline immediately apparent. Using a pen and ink technique with carefully applied color accents, Flora skillfully brings out the wit of the scene.

Winkingly and ironically endearing, Flora once again demonstrates his masterful ability to use sharp humor to capture the nuances of human nature and pinpoint social observations.
